THE NEW ANSTETT HALL

At the Lundquist College of Business, we have a vision. We foresee a place where business students revel in their environment. We picture an environment of extraordinary architecture that mirrors our forward-thinking curriculum and enables us to deliver the promise of a world-class education.

When Lillis Hall opened in October 2003, it far exceeded our expectations and went a long way toward realizing this vision. And today—thanks to Hope Anstett’s naming gift in 2010—we have commenced the rejuvenation to our last remaining historic wing, Gilbert Hall (now Anstett Hall). Prior to Hope Anstett’s gift, the building had never been substantively renovated since it opened in 1921. It lacked modern wiring and technology and was considered uncondusive to learning.

This was in stark contrast to the fabulous facilities in Lillis and Peterson halls. Lillis and Peterson’s innovative classroom layouts and technologies have revolutionized the way professors teach, their sustainable elements are being adopted as building standards across the country, and their architectural design encourages interaction among faculty, students, and the business community. This has resulted in more collaborative research, increased integrated learning, and amplified experiential education opportunities.

A SEAMLESS QUALITY

Even as we carry forth the qualities of Lillis and Peterson halls into our vision for the new Anstett Hall, we still require additional resources to ensure a seamless continuity as well as ongoing enhancements. Our team-oriented, hands-on approach to education demands that we provide classrooms and study spaces to facilitate interaction today and into the future.

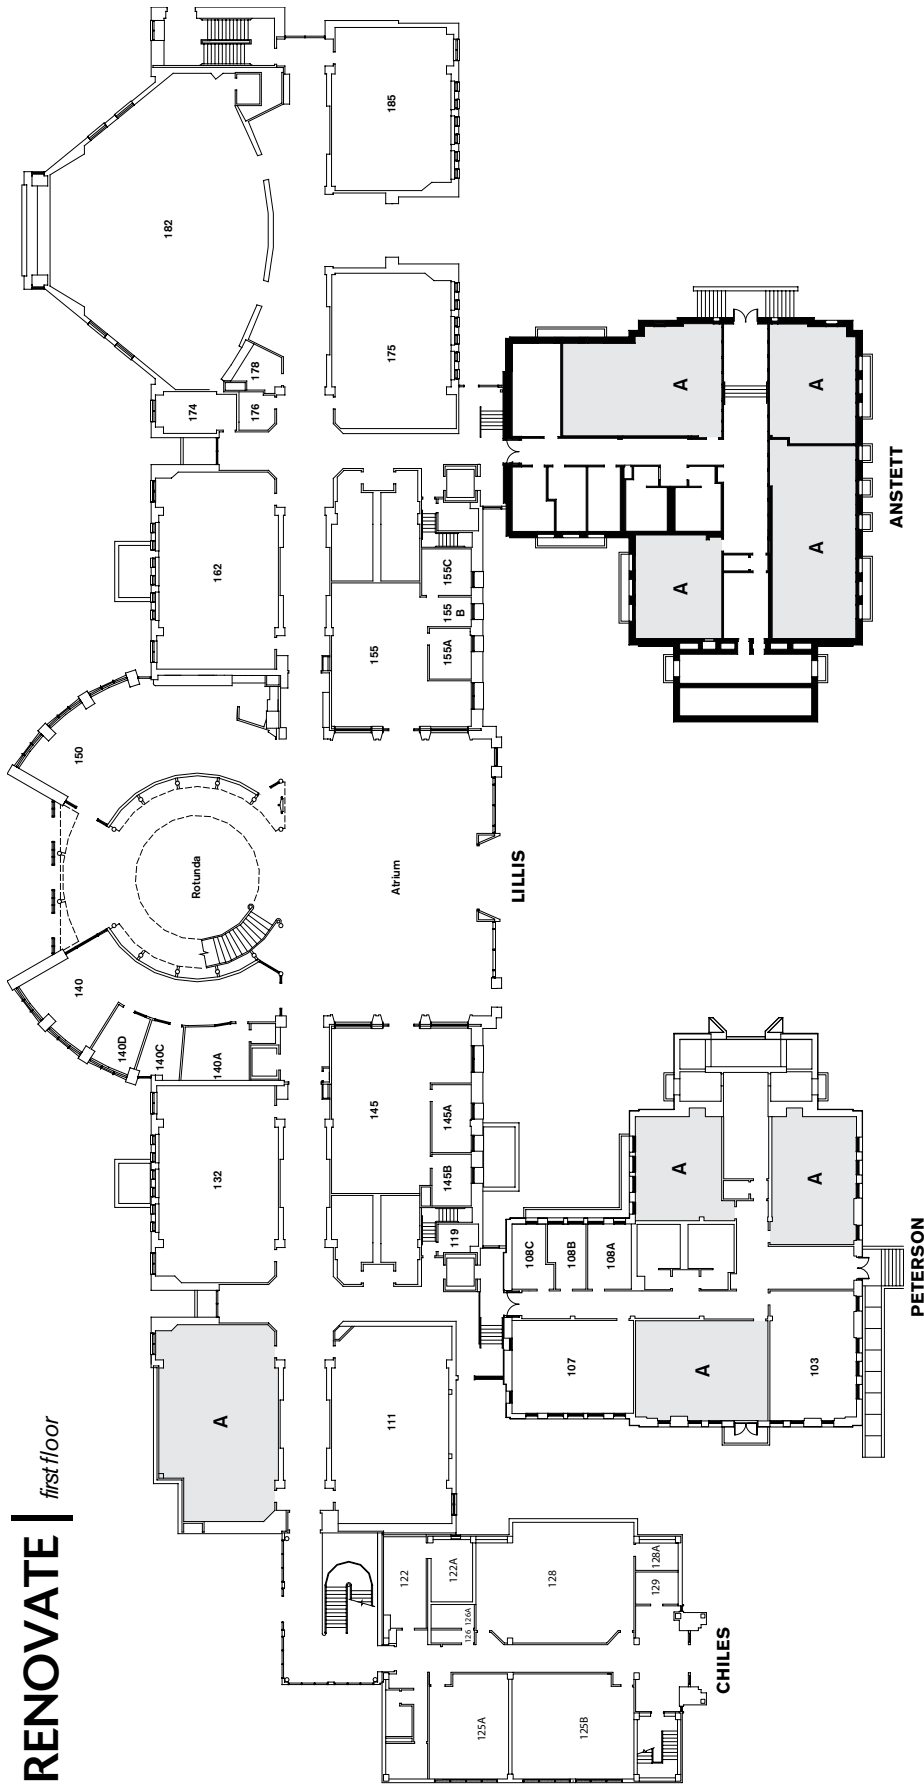

With your investment, we will be able to complete the interior remodeling in a manner that will ensure modern classrooms, the latest teaching technologies, proper facilities for faculty, and integration of the sustainable design elements present in Lillis Hall and the rejuvenated Peterson Hall. In fact, the renovations will mirror those in Peterson—from the open, sky-lit staircase to the spacious classrooms.

Only you can make the difference. With your support, we can realize our goal of providing a learning environment of seamless quality among all our wings. A quality that will ensure that we have a leading business school facility that serves the needs of students, faculty, and alumni for years to come.
